A Modern Films release

+ Q&A with director Paul Sng, contributor Ella Murtha and producer Jen Corcoran

Paul Sng, the BIFA-winning director of Poly Styrene: I Am a Cliché and Dispossession: The Great Social Housing Swindle, crafts an intimate portrait of Tish Murtha, a working-class photographer from the North East, whose work demands to be rediscovered and rightly recognised. Tish Murtha used documentary photography to capture and embrace her surroundings, and the people who occupied them. It ranged from the Newcastle working class community she grew up in to Soho sex workers in 1980s London. Despite receiving early acclaim for her work, she struggled to make a living from her talent. In Paul Sng's documentary, Tish's daughter Ella opens up her mother's archive and traces her life through previously unseen images, artefacts, letters and diaries, along with conversations with those who knew her. Narration from Maxine Peake brings Tish's own words to life, while Tish's photographs look magnificent on the big screen. The film is a fitting tribute to an artist whose photography feels more vital than ever – a rallying cry against austerity Britain.

Kimberley Sheehan, Film and Events Programmer

Paul Sng's portrait of the late Tyneside documentary photographer Tish Murtha – who earned brief acclaim for her insider depictions of deindustrial edge-of-town deprivation in the early 1980s – mourns three layers of loss. There is Murtha herself, who died of a brain aneurysm a day short of 57 in 2013, having succumbed to the same poverty and hopelessness she had made her subject. There are all the photos she never took – the spurned promise of a talent that never quite soared. And there is the waste of the countless other scrap lives depicted in and denoted by her photos of northern Britain's sacrificial working class, the family and neighbours around her Elswick community for whom she felt both easy empathy and fired passion.

Like Sng's previous resurrection of a fleeting art radical, Poly Styrene: I Am a Cliché (2021), Tish reclaims its heroine's story through the eyes of her grown daughter; indeed, Ella Murtha's broader project of curating her mother's legacy provides the film's form, with Ella gathering memories from a series of Tish's old family, friends, tutors and peers, often at an outdoor table or with a pint. This ad hoc listening tour initially feels a little lumpen, but Tish's younger sister Eileen, and three of her brothers – frequent subjects of her photos, now etched with a lifetime's toil – bring character and intimacy.

Murtha herself remains an elusive presence, freeze-framed in the past – there's no movie footage of her. But insert enactments of domestic downtime with a model against beige backdrops, face unseen, evoke a sense of inner life and the trappings of the time. And Murtha's diaries, read by Maxine Peake, capture her lucid, determined voice almost as powerfully as her photos.

'I want to photograph a policeman kicking kids,' she told her prospective university tutor David Horn – the shortest winning interview pitch ever, he chuckles. She conceptualised her work with similar incision. Murtha's conviction 'that the fundamental value of the medium is its capacity to provide direct, accurate and vital records of the conditions, events and experience that shape our lives' is an indelible credo. Murtha at length castigating the 'spectre of enforced idleness' and 'squandering of a whole generation of human potential', 'vandalism on a grand scale' from which 'barbaric and reactionary forces in our society will not be slow to make political capital', her perception clearly stretches beyond the early-1980s moment.

Years later, Murtha was similarly eloquent in a funding pitch for a project on Middlesbrough's maligned multicultural community, which she hoped would 'validate lives [and] empower them to challenge decision-making processes that all too often reject their views', as well as regenerate interest in her own career. Her application, the film tersely notes, was rejected by the Arts Council of England.

Documenting Your Community

Photography project, 'Documenting Your Community,' invites you to be inspired by Tish Murtha and take your own photos of your community, capturing life in contemporary Britain. You don't need to be a professional photographer – we'd love to see photos that capture your local shopkeeper or people in the park or pub.

The British Culture Archive, in association with Modern Films and supported by the BFI, will showcase a range of work on its website that shows the breadth of modern life today. If you'd like to be part of this photography project, then all you have to do is post your photo on Instagram and tag it #tishmurthafilm with a line or story about what your photo is about. You can also submit your photo via contact@britishculturearchive.co.uk

The photo copyright remains with you, and by tagging the photo, you will be permitting us to post the photo online on The British Culture Archive website. The photo must be original and taken by you, or you have sought permission to use it. The photo must also be appropriate and not contain any offensive content. We will not sell or distribute the content. At the end of the project, we may produce a printed programme of a selection of photos submitted and will contact you for permission to use.
